

Robert Veels/CBS

Life's MAGNIFICENT ADVENTURE

Survivor's Jeff Probst brings his thirst for adventure home to inspire young adults to pursue their dreams.

by Beth Douglass Silcox

"The adventure you're ready for is the one you get!" Jeff Probst told the world last September when he accepted his second Emmy as outstanding reality show host. Crisscrossing the globe for a decade as the face of Survivor, a show that cracked open the whole notion of reality television, Probst's adventures seem endless. He has camped out for months in the Amazon jungle and Australian Outback, not to mention an island paradise or two.

But for 47-year-old Probst, adventure encompasses more than Survivor-style challenges; life's journey as a whole, including the tough choices, lessons learned and prep work, readies him for the next opportunity.

He's grateful for those opportunities, as well as the people who encouraged him to dream big and pursue his goals. But he knows not all kids are so lucky. "There's this magnificent world out there, and as much of it is yours as you're willing to take," says Probst, who tries to convey that message to disadvantaged young people through his work with The Serpentine Project, a personalized mentorship program for L.A. youth who leave foster care when they turn 18.

Probst's own adventurous spirit took root early on. The eldest of three boys, growing up in Wichita, Kan., he was influenced as a teen by the books of Joseph Campbell, the late comparative mythology author whose philosophy was best described in his phrase, "Follow your bliss." Campbell believed everyone experiences a "Hero's Journey" involving personal growth and change, a theory he put forth in his best-known work, The Hero With a Thousand Faces, first published in 1949.

P

robst paid homage to Campbell during his Emmy acceptance speech, paraphrasing the author's message, which continues to shape his own outlook.

Still, the young Probst didn't dream too far beyond his Midwestern boundaries. "We lived in Kansas and that was the end of it," he says, until his dad's new job uprooted the 15-year-old and landed him in a busy metropolis sporting a Space Needle. The move to the Seattle area "opened my eyes up to a new way of looking at the world," he says.

An Early Storyteller

Probst developed an interest in storytelling and explored different methods of expression—as an unruly columnist for his high-school newspaper and an underground paper he and his friends founded, and later as a member of a rock band he joined after dropping out of college after 3 ½ years. His parents were not thrilled with the latter move, he says. "To their credit, they never did anything but support us kids, even when their first son did something that would make most parents say, 'Absolutely not!'"

Probst's father, who worked for Boeing, helped channel his son's interests, brokering an interview with the aircraft manufacturing company's motion picture department. Probst landed the job, and he says, for the most part, he shut up, listened and learned. He honed his storytelling skills and also learned how to work in front of the camera, which earned him more money and greater opportunities.

Signing with a Seattle agent, he got his first commercial and started hustling for more work. When a local show rejected him for an on-air job because producers wanted better-known L.A. talent, Probst checked out his competitors' audition tapes. Two stood out—a guy named Kinnear and another named Lauer. "At the time, Greg Kinnear was not a movie star and Matt Lauer wasn't the biggest star on morning television. They were just guys getting their starts," Probst says. He thought the quality of his work rivaled theirs, "so I put myself out there and I sent a tape to their agent and, you know what she said? 'I think you're right.'"

Three weeks later, he was living in Manhattan, working as an on-air personality for the FX network.

"You have to have the faith to believe in yourself, and it goes back to all those things that haunt us—asking the girl out, asking your boss for a raise, going for the next job. If you don't believe in yourself, damn sure no one else is going to," Probst says.

Role of a Lifetime

"I was ready for that adventure," he says. "I believe Joseph Campbell knew what he was talking about. If you're ready, then get on the bus and leave. If you're not, then enjoy where you are and find a new adventure. Maybe your adventure is a different one today. But whatever it is that you're ready for—whether it is to kiss the girl or go for the brass ring in your professional life—you're not going to get there until on some level you're ready for it."

After four years at FX, Probst leaped to network television on Access Hollywood, logging more than 300,000 miles traveling the world as a correspondent and gaining the chops for what would become the role of a lifetime.

When Survivor first showed up on his career radar, Probst was intrigued. The concept, he believed, appealed to an astute student of the human condition who enjoyed the choreography of personal interactions. The premise was unique for television, and Probst campaigned hard to be Survivor's host. The rest was up to executive producer Mark Burnett, whose vision for the show, Probst says, catapulted the CBS series into television history and took his career to new heights.

Yet, on that remote Malaysian island of Pulau Tiga in the South China Sea some 10 years ago, Probst never dreamed Survivor would become such a big hit, let alone a phenomenon changing the face of television.

"I was lucky enough that the guy who hired me [Mark Burnett] turned out to be a remarkable storyteller, and he knew how to execute. Because Survivor in the hands of a lot of other television producers could have been a disaster," Probst says.

From the beginning, Burnett gave Probst a voice, as well as the most valuable lesson he's ever learned about managing people. "Empower them to be their best by giving them the room to fail. Go for it. Try it. If it works, do it again tomorrow, and if it doesn't, try something else."

World Traveler

Jeff Probst's Road Map

Challenge what's expected, but know when to shut up. Jeff Probst dropped out to join a rock band, but when he landed a job with a future, he observed, listened and learned.

Create your own opportunities. "If you don't believe in yourself, damn sure no one else is going to."

Remember, "You are the measurer of your success." Whether it's a job well done or being a better person today than you were yesterday, "only you truly determine if you're successful or not."

Express gratitude. "This knapsack of advantage that I was born with... I pretty much got the lottery."

Surviving Brazil

Jeff Probst awards the immunity necklace to contestant Stephen Fishbach.

Monty Brinton/CBS/Getty Images

Measuring Success

Probst is proud of his Survivor work because it represents his best effort, which, ultimately, is the only measure of success that really counts. Trite? Not for Probst, who believes giving your best means doing your homework, putting in the time, concentrating and getting your priorities straight.

“One thing I’ve learned is you are the measurer of your success, and that’s something that can easily get lost in job titles or how much money you make or awards you’re given for your performance at work,” Probst says. “But the truth is that only you truly determine if you’re successful or not.”

Although Probst relishes his accomplishments and the tangible aspects of his celebrity, it’s the personal progress he’s made for which he’s proudest. “I’ve worked the hardest on how to become a better person on this planet,” he says. “There are certainly people who do a lot better things than I do and more often, but I’m a better person than I was yesterday, and that’s the measure of success that I hold myself to.”

Countless starry nights in makeshift homes on location in jungles and on beaches have given Probst opportunities to contemplate the world and his place in it. “Survivor has been the greatest gift ever,” he says. Finding himself living in Kenya or on the island of Samoa for four months at a time, Probst is witness to a broader sense of life, where food, culture, religion, even the way women and men are treated socially, is different.

Laughter, however, seems a common denominator. Probst recalls pickup volleyball or soccer games with residents on Samoa. “They are all laughing, even when they are in competition. There’s never taunting or making fun of somebody for hitting a bad shot. It’s fun. There’s laughter. They’re playing.”

Despite economic hardships unfathomable to most Americans, life and play is celebrated, and that has made an impression on Probst. “I’m here for an uncertain amount of time and I want to get the most out of it. Part of that is things that I want to achieve in work, but the more I travel and the more experiences I have with Survivor around the world, the more I realize that I also want to live, I want to laugh and I want to love.”

“I’m here for an uncertain amount of time and I want to get the most out of it.”

Teaching Kids to Dream

That philosophy includes leveraging his celebrity for the greater good. Probst helps raise money and awareness for The Serpentine Project, whose mentors help young adults develop action plans to reach their goals—which can include voc-tech classes, college or internships—then apply for Life Grants for tuition, books and supplies, rent assistance and medical costs directly related to their individualized goals.

“Our goal is really simple: to teach these kids how to dream and get their minds to open up to the Joseph Campbell idea, The adventure you’re ready for is the one you get,” he says.

Probst also has helped raise money and awareness for the American Red Cross, which provided assistance to tsunami-ravaged Samoa shortly after the 20th season of Survivor wrapped shooting there.

Celebrating Survivor’s 20th season, which airs in February, is perhaps even more poignant considering Mother Nature’s devastation. While the concept for this new season took some backroom wrangling, Probst says, “We came up with an idea that we felt really encompassed what Survivor has been about for the last 20 seasons.... It’s pretty clear that if you’re a Survivor fan, then you’re going to enjoy this.” The new season will feature 20 of Survivor’s former contestants competing on two teams—the heroes and the villains.

Returning after four months in Samoa, Los Angeles hits like a freight train moving 100 mph—texting, BlackBerrys, jobs, traffic. Among Survivor’s enduring lessons, Probst says, is that he is not the center of the universe and his all-important schedule is just his stuff to deal with. “Man, there’s balance,” Probst says—a lesson Americans could learn from the islanders of Samoa.

But the United States still rates No. 1 as the greatest country in the world for Probst. “You’re born here in a country that’s built on opportunity,” he says. “I’m reminded of that all the time. This knapsack of advantage that I was born with... I pretty much got the lottery. Throw on top of it two parents who love their children and are dedicated to them. You know, if you can’t make something of your life, on some level, given that, then it’s on you.” S

Success Mentors to Go!

Download quality, convenient MP3s and eBooks at great prices!

I learned leadership principles from John C. Maxwell on my morning run.

40
New Titles!

Jim Rohn • John C. Maxwell • Tom Peters • Connie Podesta • Les Brown
Daniel Pink • Stephen Covey • Terri Sjodin • Jack Canfield Nido Qubein
• Tom Hopkins • Harvey Mackay and more!

SHOP NOW at SUCCESSstore™
SUCCESS.com/store